Americans," said Mr. Belmont, "they have been during five months (between August and February 1890), to the vain effort through the medium of America to get them away from Cuba." He added that their indifference would be proved by the fact that they had received repeated communications from several United States officials in Cuba, but, in reality, at no time were present has there existed any forceful or non-partisan feeling against the new Republic (of) Philippine republicans and the Republic of the United States.

In December, 1889, the Treaty between America and Spain was signed in Paris, and Article X says: "The United States Congress will take care, in due season, that all that concerns the civil rights and political status of the native who are
